I is in English considered both as a vowel and consonant. I vowel has a long sound, as fine, fire, which is usually marked by an e final; and a short sound, as fit, thine. Prefixed to e it makes a diphthong of the same sound with the fat i, or double e, ee: thus field, yield, are spoken as field, yeeld. Subjoined to a or e it makes them long, as fail, neigh. The sound of i before another i, and at the end of a word, is always expressed by y. J consonant has invariably the same sound with that of g in gian; as jade.
I person personal. f. [ik, Gothick; ic, Sax.] I,

NITRE. f. [nitre, Fr. nitrum, Lat.] The salt which we know at this time, under the name of nitre or salt-petre, is a crystalline, pellucid, but somewhat whitish substance, of an acrid and bitterish taste, impressing a peculiar sense of coldness upon the tongue. This salt, though it affords, by means of fire, an acid spirit, capable of dissolving almost every thing, yet manifests no sign of its containing any acid at all in its crude state. Nitre is of the number of those salts which are naturally blended in imperceptible particles in earths, stones, as the particles of metals in their ores. The earth from which nitre is made, both in Persia and the East-Indies, is a kind of yellowish red found in the bare cliffs of the sides exposed to the northern and eastern winds. This marl the salt is separated from, and the crystals into which it is then dissolved, and from the East-Indies, are found to be pure, and impure. Earths of white moistened by the dung and excrement of animals, frequently afford nitre in large quantities. The earths at the bottom of pigeonhouses, and those of stables and cow-houses, all afford nitre, on being thrown into water and boiled. In France, where very little nitre is imported, they make it from the rubbish of old mortar and plaister of buildings. There is no question but a manufactory of nitre might be established in England, to as much advantage as that of France. The nitrum or nitre of the ancients, is a genuine, native, and true salt, extremely different from our nitre, and from all other native salts; being a fixed alkali.

QUICKSILVER. f. [quick and silver.] Quicksilver, called mercury by the chymists, is a naturally fluid mineral, and the heaviest of all known bodies next to gold, and is the more heavy and fluid, as it is more pure; its nature is so homogeneous and simple, that it is a question whether gold itself be more so: it penetrates the parts of all the other metals, renders them brittle, and in part dissolves them: it is wholly volatile in the fire, and may be driven up in vapour by a degree of heat very little greater than that of boiling water: it is the least tenacious of all bodies, and every smaller drop may be again divided by the lightest touch into a multitude of others, and is the most divisible of all bodies: the specific gravity of pure mercury is to water as 140:0 to 1000, and as it is the heaviest of all fluids, it is also the coldest, and when heated the hottest: of the various ores, in which mercury is found, cinnabar is the richest and most valuable, which is extremely heavy, and of a bright and beautiful red colour: the ancients all esteemed quicksilver a poison, nor was it brought into internal use till about two hundred and twenty years ago, which was first occasioned by the shepherds, who ventured to give it their sheep to kill worms; and as they received no hurt by it, it was soon concluded, that men might take it safely: in time, the diggers in the mines, when they found it crude, swallowed it in vast quantities, in order to sell it privately, when they had voided it by stool: but too free a use of so powerful a medicine cannot be always without danger. Hil.

WATER. f. [water, Dutch; wæten, Saxon.] 1. Sir Isaac Newton defines water, when pure, to be a very fluid salt, volatile, and void of all savour or taste; and it seems to consist of small, smooth, hard, porous, spherical particles, of equal diameters, and of equal specific gravities, as Dr. Cheyne observes. Their smoothness accounts for their sliding easily over one another's surfaces: their sphericity keeps them also from touching one another in more points than one; and by both these their friction in sliding over one another, is rendered the least possible. Their hardness accounts for the incompressibility of water, when it is free from the intermixture of air. The porosity of water is so very great, that there is at least forty times as much space as matter in it. Quincy, Shakefp. 2. The sea. Common Prayer. 3. Urine. Shakefp. 4.
